THE HUMAN HAIR THE HUMAN HAIR.

(173- CAUTION.—The ignorance, humbug and quackery on this subject has of late become so intolerably impudent, that the public should really be on their guard against the many pretended nostrums for the restoration and preservation of the hair which are now dividing their attention and opinions. What the specific virtue of any of them may be, I do not pretend to determine, for no one of has ever heard of or seen their effects, but this I know that not one of the many who pratend to the discovery of a specific for the growth of the human hair, has ever studied or in fact possesses any knowledge either of its organization or structure.

Clirchugh's Treatise on the Anatomy and Physiology of the Skin and Hair has proved of the utmost importance to these pseudo professors, as it has given them an insight to the subject which before they did not possess, and of ceurse were most gravely sitent upon; but since the appearance of Clirchugh's Treatise they discourse most eloquently on the pretended virtues of their nostrums, and prate as philosophically of bulbs, roots, &c., as if they had derived their information from stude has been gleaned from the labors of another.

Under all these circumstances, it may be reasonably inferred that little or no faith be is to placed in the use of any of those Oils, Balms, Composition, &c. which are daily foisted on the public, by ignorant impiries, who in their advertisements put all rules of composition, grummar, and orthography at defiance, Read C's. Treatise, which may be had gratis at his rooms; ever thing like quackery is there utterly discarded; nothing set down but what is founded on philosophic principles and practical experience, and beyond the power of refutation; the public will therefore discriminate between the impiricism of ignorance and the plain, unvarnished claims of truth.
